Is There a Chinese Path to Sustainable Development?
 April 17, 2023 | 6:30pm HKT

Kenneth Pomeranz
 University Professor of Modern Chinese History and the College
 Faculty Director, The University of Chicago Yuen Campus in Hong Kong

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

China’s spectacular economic development of the last 40 years promoted a belief that successful economic development would be accompanied everywhere by convergence towards a similar set of institutions – in particular, an apolitical, technocratic, and government bureaucracy with a significant role in economic management. At the same time, some scholars insist instead on the distinctive nature of China’s path to modernity.

Amidst increasing doubt about whether any society has a path to sustainable prosperity, this lecture looks at some of the distinctive institutions underlying Chinese growth and asks to what extent they may be useful (or harmful) in efforts to make modern prosperity compatible with environmental viability.

Transforming Cancer Research: The Day Tomorrow Began

In the mid-20th century, we knew very little about the causes of cancer. But one University of Chicago scientist became convinced that it involved a factor that few had suspected. Check out the latest episode of The Day Tomorrow Began on how her discovery would fundamentally change the way we understand and treat cancer.
